Art and poor eyesight
An Australian neurosurgeon says that the painting style of Impressionists could be explained by their short-sightedness. He names some paintings as examples, including Monet's famous "Impression, Rising Sun." The Australian researcher notes that there is a lack of detail, colours are blurred and objects are barely shadows, which corresponds to what short-sighted people see. F

Financial news

Canadian Business magazine selected HOYA Corporation stock, traded on the Tokyo Stock Exchange, as one of the top five investment picks in the April 26th issue. The reasons cited by the magazine include HOYA's diversified portfolio, its 80% share of the global market for Mask Blanks, and the fact that the company's supply and production has been virtually unaffected by Japan's devastating earthquake and tsunami in March 2011. HOYA also recently reported that its revenues grew 2.7% in 2011, and profit before tax was up by over 26%.

On June 16, Sãfilo Group will buy back in advance over $82 million in bonds that were going to be bought in May 2013. This represents 30.8% of Sãfilo's outstanding bonds, worth a total of $267 millions. By doing this, the company hopes to save on financial costs.

Luxottica will open the first Sunglass Hut outlet in Brazil. The new store will be located in the Fashion Mall in Rio de Janeiro. This marks the start of Luxottica in the giant South American country, where the Italian group hopes to expand the sale of its sunglasses.

Brief exercises do not have any effect on IOP

Brief periods of exercise do not significantly change IOP, according to a study from the State University of New York College of Optometry. Investigators evaluated the effect of various exercises on the eyes in 20 young, healthy patients. Measured before and after the exercises, mean IOP stayed between 16.8 mm Hg and 17.8 mm Hg. F

Flowers in your eyes

A University of Oregon researcher is trying to develop nanoflowers that could help people who have lost their eyesight. The nanoflowers come from metal nanoparticles that grow and self-assemble in a natural process called diffusion limited aggregation. Retinal neurons are fractals, but the photodiodes usually implanted behind the retina are not. Fractal nanoflowers implanted into the eyes of blind patients would provide efficient interface circuitry to collect light captured by the retina and guide it to neurons, for relay to the optic nerve. F
